

companies for settling North America.

This company landed a colony at the mouth of the Kennebec river in 1607, but they were unfortunate and all returned to England. The same year an expedition accidentally discovered the Chesapeake bay and founded a colony on the James river and named it Jamestown. This company consisted of gentlemen of broken fortune, some tradesmen, some footmen, few were farmers or mechanics, or persons in any way fitted for the life they sought.

But happily for Virginia there sailed with the founders of a new empire a man whom Providence had highly gifted with fitness to govern his fellow men. His unromantic name was John Smith, but he was cast in a heroic mold, strongly built, and still under thirty he had been a soldier from boyhood, mighty in single combat, roaming over the world in search of adventures. When the colonizing fever ran high in England he joined the Virginian expedition, ultimately becoming its chief, for this was the first permanent English settlement which struck its roots in American soil.

The colonists were charmed with the new country, but there was much hard labor to be performed before they could obtain a subsistence from the forest primeval. The exiled gentlemen labored manfully in chopping trees but unwonted exertion blistered their hands so that every third blow had a loud oath to drown the echo. Smith devised a plan to number the oaths, and at night for every oath the offender was to have a can of water poured down his sleeve.

The emigrants landed in early spring. Summer came on and supplies of food ran low. Smith wrote that "had we been as free from sins as from gluttony and drunkenness we might have been canonized as saints." Poor fellows! they sickened and died until one-half were gone by the time autumn came. But their crops were ripe and the survivors were freed from famine. Winter brought wild fowl and game, and a healthful temperature.

Smith's restless spirit now induced him to further adventures so he and a small company of men set out up the Chickahominy to seek a passage to the Pacific, but all got into the hands of the Indians. The companions were all butchered, but Smith produced a pocket compass and got to talking against time, so they showed the marvelous man around the different villages but concluded after much deliberation and counselling concluded such superhuman powers would better be extinguished. This is where Pocahontas comes in and saved his life by catching her head in her arms just as the fatal stroke was about to fall. Dear Pocahontas! many a time after that she saved the Virginia colony, and her regard for the white people led her to love and marry a white man, the first American heiress to wed an Englishman.
